Soccer heads fifa world cup

This way, you will avoid these dangerous outbreaks during your summer trips. In Jaa Pinterest, the FIFA World Cup begins today with millions of expected visitors, including tens of thousands of Americans. But American football fans get a warning from public health officials: Make sure you've had measles vaccination. In Europe, measles cases increased fourfold last year compared to the previous year. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) wants to make sure Americans are protected and don't bring measles back to this country. In fact, we recommend that all passengers be up to date with all routine vaccinations, Gary Brunette, head of the CDC's Travellers' Health branch, told Healthline.FIFA World Cup Russia is from June 14 to July 15, with more than 2.4 million tickets already sold. In addition to the World Cup, millions of Americans will travel abroad to Europe this summer. What is the risk of measles coming here from an infected holidaymaker? The risks are probably pretty damn low, said William Schaffner, a specialist in infectious diseases at vanderbilt University School of Medicine. He added that while this may be changing, as France and Italy have recently passed legislation that would make these vaccinations more routine, there are still vulnerable children and adults in these areas. Although the United States is carrying out systematic measles, mumps and rubella vaccination, there have been cases where parents have withered vaccinations to their children for fear of side effects. According to Schaffner, it is these unvaccinated children and adults who are at risk of developing the virus when travelling to areas with active infections. I wouldn't want any child going through a case of measles, he said. It can be a very unpleasant risk to your health, seriously. In addition to fever, chills, cough, stuffy nose, conjunctivitis and rash, complications can include mid-ear infections and pneumonia. Schaffner said one in 1,000 people with measles can suffer from a very severe encephalitis called measles encephalitis. The older you are... the more likely you are to be really ill and develop a complication of pneumonia, he said. Before we received measles vaccinations in the mid-1960s, we had 400 children who died of measles and its complications in the United States every year. Schaffner advises that passengers heading to the World Cup and those travelling to Europe in general receive at least before travelling from the recommended MMR vaccines. It provides considerable protection for the majority of people, and when you return, you will return, another dose, he said. One dose of the MMR vaccine provides 93% protection against measles and two doses provide 97% protection. According to Schaffner, the adverse effects of MMR are typically minor, including a random sore arm and a couple of degrees of fever in a small percentage of the population. He warns that vaccination has been carried out on weakened live weakened viruses and should not be given to anyone with a weakened or weakened immune system. Travelers planning summer trips outside Europe may face news of more frightening-sounding outbreaks, including the deadly Ebola virus in Congo and the Nipah virus in southern India.Brunette said that while world and local health authorities are actively involved in curbing outbreaks, there is currently no real concern about the spread of viruses. We monitor these situations, we monitor them very closely, he said. It is typically a local epidemic, and although it concerns an outbreak, we do not believe that there is a significant risk of imports into the United States. He said the locations of outbreaks are very remote and difficult to reach — meaning viruses are more likely to remain under control. If someone traveled to these areas, they would be advised to avoid contact with sick or dead people or bodily fluids from these people, said Brunette. There are other diseases that endemic to countries that pose ongoing public health risks, including the Zika virus in Central and South America, the Caribbean and other places, she said. Pregnant women are most at risk and should not travel to areas at risk of infection. We're not trying to make people afraid to travel, he said, adding that travelers can report these illnesses on CDC Travelers' Health. We encourage healthy travel. In addition to travel security, Brunette said there is a robust public health care system in place in the United States in the event of an outbreak. The CDC works closely with Customs and Border Protection for regular training. They are trained to identify diseases at ports of entry, he said. If someone is ill, they could be arrested for further evaluation. The CDC also has quarantine stations at the country's 18 airports. If a sufferer develops symptoms upon arrival in the United States, a reporting system is also in place that starts at the doctor's office. Doctors are always trained to ask sick patients if they have recently travelled. When something unusual is detected, the doctor notifies the state Department of Health. If a larger response is required, the CDC will be notified. In a hypothetical Case of Ebola, Brunette said that within minutes, the CDC will be notified. The CDC would react, react together with the state. The World Cup has been played every four years as the best in the world except in 1942 and 1946 due to the Second World War.
